The Nasa climate scientists who claimed 2014 set a new record for global warmth last night admitted they were only 38 per cent sure this was true.

In a press release on Friday, Nasa's Goddard Institute for Space Studies (GISS) claimed its analysis of world temperatures showed '2014 was the warmest year on record'.

The claim made headlines around the world, but yesterday it emerged that GISS's analysis – based on readings from more than 3,000 measuring stations worldwide – is subject to a margin of error. Nasa admits this means it is far from certain that 2014 set a record at all.

Yet the Nasa press release failed to mention this, as well as the fact that the alleged 'record' amounted to an increase over 2010, the previous 'warmest year', of just two-hundredths of a degree – or 0.02C. The margin of error is said by scientists to be approximately 0.1C – several times as much.

As a result, GISS's director Gavin Schmidt has now admitted Nasa thinks the likelihood that 2014 was the warmest year since 1880 is just 38 per cent. However, when asked by this newspaper whether he regretted that the news release did not mention this, he did not respond. Another analysis, from the Berkeley Earth Surface Temperature (BEST) project, drawn from ten times as many measuring stations as GISS, concluded that if 2014 was a record year, it was by an even tinier amount.

Nasa's Goddard Institute for Space Studies (GISS) claimed its analysis of world temperatures showed '2014 was the warmest year on record'

Its report said: 'Numerically, our best estimate for the global temperature of 2014 puts it slightly above (by 0.01C) that of the next warmest year (2010) but by much less than the margin of uncertainty.'

Heading for space, where no one can hear her scream!

'Therefore it is impossible to conclude from our analysis which of 2014, 2010, or 2005 was actually the warmest year... the Earth's average temperature for the past decade has changed very little.'

Scientists disagree over its significance, but there is little doubt that the rapid warming of the 1980s and early 1990s has slowed – although greenhouse gas emissions have surged.

Bob Ward, of the Grantham Institute on Climate Change, said the new figures showed the notion that global warming had 'stopped' was a 'myth', although it had 'temporarily slowed'. Since 1951, he added, the long-term trend was for warming of 0.12C per decade, and in his view, it would 'pick up again unabated' if emissions continued to rise.

However, if the long-term rate is 0.12C per decade, this would mean the world would be 1C or so warmer by the end of the century, not 4C-5C as some have claimed.

Climate sceptics insisted that the new figures showed the warming 'pause' had continued. Dr David Whitehouse, of the Global Warming Policy Forum, said 'there has been no statistically significant warming trend since 1997' – because the entire increase over this period was smaller than the error margin.

Dr Ed Hawkins, associate professor of climate science at the University of Reading, said the past 15 years had seen a slightly slower rate of warming.

But he added: 'You have to take a longer view, because 15 years is too short a period. We expect natural fluctuations, volcanic eruptions and changes in solar output to sometimes slow and sometimes increase warming rates.'

How do you know the effects of warming will be negative? Is that a 100% definite assessment on that claim? Or something lower e.g. 38%?

And the "on record" is meant to sound i,praside but it depends whose record it is. There are records of temperature in mediaeval times which were much warmer than now (grazing in Greenland, etc) but that would mean looking at another set of records!

My question is this. What was going on in the world in 1880? Were those steam powered locomotives heating things up? Maybe horses and livestock were creating a crap-tonne of methane.

The fact it fell within the margin of error makes it invalid. There us no scientific justification to claim 2014 as the warmest. NOAA and NASA knew that. Appalling. This is a political move that has nothing to do with science.

Zed dead what ever your name is - the issue for me is that they published the results summary without disclosing the error or the probability associated with the claim being made. They made a categoric claim that 2014 was the hottest year on record without the other extremely relevant information. Now in terms of scientific protocol that's not the way to do things, is it, unless there is some other non scientific reason for doing so.

Is there a source to the comments made by Gavin Schmidt? Besides it just happening last night? And is there anywhere on the NASA site where it lists the report where it gives the level of certainty? I feel like I can't just any news source summarizing information. They all seem to be politically charged even if I typically agree with the political leanings of the source. I'm also tired of scientists hiding pertinent information because they apparently believe it is for the greater good. Their science feels more like a faith than actual science.

Yes Zed 48% is higher than any other year, but it is still less than 50.00001%. Meaning it is unlikely that 2014 is the warmest year on record. And that word 'unlikely' comes straight from the information in the NOAA report.

@ddpalmer - you simply don't understand what you're talking about. Confidence levels are expressed as a percentage. There is a much higher confidence level that 2014 was the hottest year than for any other year. Let me guess, you read crank anti-science denier blogs and so think you're a climate expert.
